I am a college student looking to get away for my spring break, but I have not traveled a lot and do not know where I could go because I am on a budget and want my travel to be affordable. I am going to go onto this website because I would like to explore places to travel based on my preferences, and see the flight prices and compare them to other places to travel that are of my interest.

I am going to go to this website and first I am sent to the main screen where I have to log in or create an account to be able to start my search. I created my account with an authentication. Now I am able to search. It asks me what dates I want to travel and what weather I want. I am going to choose the dates March 4-11 because that is my spring break, and then for temperature, I am going to say that I want snow, and a temperature below 50 degrees because I really want to go skiing this spring break. I click go and now I can see a whole list of places for me to travel for these dates, based on the weather I chose. I am able to see the different flight prices for flying to each place, so that I can pick something in my price range. The flights for these trips seem pretty expensive, and considering that on top of the flight costs I also would have to pay for a hotel, ski rental, lift tickets, and more, I am going to search and see how much cheaper it would be for me to go somewhere warm.

I go back to the home page and choose the same dates, but with sunny and 70+ degrees for a warm vacation. I now can see that these flights are much cheaper, so I probably will end up going on a warm vacation instead of skiing this spring break.
